Area Colleges Gear Up for Fully In-Person Classes This Fall

BY KELLY GARRITY

After the COVID-19 pandemic moved classes and activities online last year, Boston colleges and universities are looking to get back to a more normal experience this fall.

Many schools in our coverage area—including Boston University, Berklee College of Music, Emmanuel College, Massachusetts College of Pharmacy and Health Sciences (MCPHS), Northeastern University, Simmons University and Wentworth Institute of Technology—have already announced that they will require vaccinations for any students planning to return to campus. Some—BU, Emmanuel, MCPHS and Northeastern—have even set up vaccination clinics for students living on campus.

Requirements for faculty vaccinations have so far been less stringent than those for students. None of the Colleges of the Fenway have announced a vaccination requirement for faculty or staff, nor have Berklee, BU, or Northeastern. Though some, including Wentworth and BU, have strongly encouraged staff to get vaccinated. According to guidance from the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, employers can require vaccinations for employees but must grant exceptions to those unable to receive the vaccine because of medical conditions or seriously held religious beliefs.

Because of vaccination requirements, many schools have announced their goal to reopen for fully in-person learning and extracurricular activities by the fall.

“As vaccine distribution increases, we are assuming that by fall all members of our community (students, staff, and faculty) who wish to be vaccinated against COVID-19, either will have already been vaccinated or can be vaccinated at Boston University, once they arrive in Boston before the start of the semester,” wrote BU President Robert A. Brown in a March 12 letter to students and parents. “The expected efficacy of the vaccines and comprehensive immunization will make possible the full return to learning in our classrooms, studios, and laboratories without the social distancing protocols that have been in use since last September.”

Simmons University President Lynn Perry Wooten announced in a March 26 statement that Simmons plans to have students return in person as well. “We are excited to return to in-person teaching and learning that enables students and faculty to engage together in the classroom,” she said. “We expect that social distancing guidelines will be modified, allowing us to increase classroom occupancy, and resume valued in-person learning experiences.”

Northeastern shortly followed suit. “We expect to be back fully in-person at regular occupancy, including fully in-person teaching, and normal occupancy in residence halls and dining facilities,” said Ken Henderson, Northeastern’s chancellor and senior vice president for learning, in an April 6 statement.

“All state universities will offer a traditional schedule of in-person classes in addition to online and hybrid options for both residential and commuter student populations,” said the Massachusetts State College Council of Presidents, the decision-making body for all state colleges, including MassArt, in a statement released April 26.

On May 3, Emmanuel’s President Janet Eisner said in a statement that Emmanuel, “is planning for a full resumption of face-to-face classes for the Fall 2021 semester, as well as a full slate of co-curricular activities and events and a return to near-normal capacities in the residence halls.”

“It is clear that vaccinations are a powerful tool in combating COVID-19, and requiring vaccines will protect our Community and ensure that MCPHS does its part to help our nation move toward herd immunity,” said MCPHS President Richard J. Lessard in a letter to the MCPHS students.

According to Wentworth’s website, the university is also, “preparing a fall semester experience that begins to restore the pre-pandemic normalcy that we all enjoyed.”

On May 17, the Baker administration announced that Massachusetts would lift COVID-19 restrictions, including masking requirements for unvaccinated individuals and capacity limits, starting May 29. Hours later, Acting Mayor of Boston Kim Janey announced that Boston would lift restrictions in accordance with the state’s guidance.

Though some colleges and universities have yet to announce masking and social-distancing requirements for the fall, Northeastern has already announced its protocol. On May 19, the university announced that it would no longer require masks for vaccinated students and faculty, both indoors and outdoors on campus, with the exception of inside the University Health and Counseling Services office and areas where masks are required by law. Henderson said the university would not require unmasked individuals to show proof of vaccination and will instead rely on the honor system to enforce the new protocol.

Fenway CDC Hosts Briskly Paced Annual Meeting

BY RUTH KHOWAIS

On April 29—its 48th anniversary—the Fenway Community Development Corporation (Fenway CDC) held a virtual annual meeting.

Executive Director Leah Camhi outlined the organization’s accomplishments for the past year, which include advocacy for affordable housing, the Fair Foods food-distribution program, organizing to support restoration of the #55 bus, and advocacy for the home rule petition. She also highlighted the group’s proposal to erect a 27-unit rental building on a vacant parcel at 72 Burbank St., with 100-percent affordable housing.

The CDC presented community-service awards to community activists John LaBella and Kristen Mobilia and to Lifeboat-Boston, a food pantry that provides free groceries for anyone in Boston in need and operates weekly pickups out of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church on Peterborough Street.

A highlight of the event was the keynote speech by Chuck Collins, director of the Program on Inequality and the Common Good at the Institute for Policy Studies and author of The Wealth Hoarders: How Billionaires Pay Millions to Hide Trillions. Collins spoke about the affordability crisis in Boston and shared strategies for creating greater equity. “There are larger economic forces destroying cities,” Collins said, grouping these disruptive forces under the label “the wealth inequality effect.”

The Fenway CDC, he said, has had to wrestle with these invisible giants in the form of global wealth that often hides in offshore tax shelters, including private equity companies looking for places to “park their wealth.” These companies, Collins explained, invest in short-term rentals, such as Airbnb, that take units out of the housing market. Collins said these shell companies and trusts are buying our neighborhood and their legal structure makes it hard for us to know who the real owners are. They also “park their money” in luxury real estate. Collins mentioned the recently opened One Dalton Place as an example. There, he said, one-third to one-half of units are owned by “anonymous shell companies.”

How do we protect residents of the Fenway, Mission Hill, and other neighborhoods from the wealth inequality effect? One proposal promotes the idea of levying a two-percent tax on the transfer of residential units that cost more than $2 million; other cities, including Concord and Nantucket, already have such a surcharge in place. If we had such a tax, Collins said, it would have generated $7 million to $8 million in revenue just at One Dalton Place, money that could have been used to fund affordable housing elsewhere in the city. He also said that the state legislature needs to approve a home rule petition allowing a tenant option of purchase. The latter would enable residents to have first choice on buying a rental unit when it went on the market. Collins said that a tenant option exists for mobile homes in Massachusetts—specifically the rented lots they occupy in mobile home developments—but not apartments or condos.

The meeting ended with a raffle for a gift card and copies of Collins’s book. Ruth Khowais lives in the West Fens.

Restaurants Ease Out of Pandemic

Taking advantage of regulations that let restaurants expand their outdoor serving areas into parking spaces during the pandemic, Sweet Cheeks Q opened an eating deck last month on Boylston Street in the West Fens (upper photo). The street expansions became possible because of emergency state legislation but will expire several weeks after the Commonwealth lifts a state of emergency this month. The legislature has just begun considering a year-long extension of the street takeovers. Around the corner (lower photo), Time Out Market at 401 Park came out of “hibernation,” the term of art for money-saving wintertime shutdowns that swept the restaurant industry during the pandemic.

DEVELOPMENT UPDATES

BY ALISON PULTINAS

58 Burbank Street

There’s a new twist in the saga for 58 Burbank, a small narrow lot with a boarded-up, single-story commercial structure of unknown vintage.

On May 18, the Zoning Board of Appeal (ZBA) approved real estate investor Patrick Haydon’s seven-story residential building. The building will feature an owner’s penthouse apartment, which will be 2,300 square feet and take up two and half stories. Floors two to five will have small one-bedroom units—three are technically considered micro. The first floor will feature “work pods” and a conference room to be shared with the Fenway CDC staff, which has offices next door.

Multiple zoning exceptions were requested—usable open space is insufficient, floor-area ratio is excessive, off-street parking and loading and rear-yard setback are inadequate—but, attorney Marc LaCasse said the height did not represent a violation. According to underlying zoning, the allowed height is 75 feet.

Previous plans for the site fell apart for different reasons. When Marc Roos and Mike Meskin owned the property, the ZBA approved their proposal for a four-story apartment building in 2004, but the project never started. Later owner Ty Gupta, also known as Tarun Gupta, received a $4 million mortgage from Wellesley Bank in 2019. City assessing records list him as the current owner. Unpaid property taxes have been a problem for all the various investors in recent years.

Former Fenway News volunteers remember working out of the building when Northeastern University owned it. According to East Fens resident Mat Thall, the newspaper, the Fenway CDC and STOP (Symphony Tenants Operating Project) all used the structurally deficient building at no charge beginning in the late 1970s. Several efforts to get Northeastern to donate the property to the community, specifically one of the groups that used it, proved unsuccessful.

Midtown Hotel

Northeastern undergraduates will continue to occupy rooms at the Midtown Hotel in the 2021-22 school year, but the building is still slated for demolition to make way for National Development’s large rental building. Demolition will begin soon after the students vacate the building. The Boston Civic Design Commission appears ready to give the project its approval at its June meeting. The most recent BCDC subcommittee meeting accepted a revised design for the Huntington Avenue facade and substitution of a South End-style pocket park to compensate for the loss of a historic rowhouse at 1 Cumberland

PIG IN A POKE? BUYER PICKS UP CONDO AT KENMORE SQ. AUCTION

Speculators bid on a Kenmore Square property sight-unseen on May 13. Jeffrey Mann of Paul Saperstein Auctioneers solicited bids from pre-qualified buyers for a one-bedroom condo at 464 Comm. Ave. in the Braemore. The winning bid, at $621,000, came from the man pictured on the right holding his phone.

Ballpark Graduations Come on Cusp of Full Reopening

The pandemic brought new uses to Fenway Park, one of the few structures in the City that could host large gatherings with six feet of physical distancing among everyone in attendance. In the November elections the ballpark served a polling station, and for February and March it became a mass-vaccination site. Last month brought a new role—college graduations. Northeastern and Bentley University held commencements, and on May 23, Suffolk University graduates entered through Gate B for their school's ceremony

REPORT FINDS PRIVATE FUNDRAISING WORSENS BPS INEQUITIES

BY ALISON PULTINAS

A report from the grassroots Boston Public Schools (BPS) parents group Quality Education for Every Student (QUEST) revealed troubling data on private fundraising for public schools in April. The report detailed alarming inequities across the system.

The data showed that nearly one-fifth of Boston's schools have separate nonprofit arms for raising money. Perhaps not surprising, schools with more economically disadvantaged meeting on private fundraising and the questions it raises about equity across schools. The meeting will take place Wednesday, June 2, at 6pm (register at tinyurl.com/37884bfy).

QUEST's report, available at www.questparents.org, used data from a 2018 legally mandated districtwide audit of individual schools required after an IRS investigation found irregularities in how accounts for extracurricular activities were managed. The Ernst & Young audit looked at five years of data; QUEST then compared the private funding for 125 schools, and two Fenway schools topped the list.

Boston Latin School had close to $60 million in accounts managed by the Boston Latin School Association. Boston Arts Academy came in second among BPS schools—its nonprofit arm, Boston Arts Academy Foundation (BAAF), raised $14,161 per pupil in 2018.

And in 2021, there was lots of hubbub around the Arts Academy's Honors Gala at donor Ernie Boch Jr.'s mansion on May 1. NBC Boston and Boston society photographer Bill Brett documented the event and the day after, a full-page advertisement ran in the Boston Globe thanking corporate sponsors (the Globe donated the ad). Developer Steve Samuels, who sponsored a $25,000 donor match in last year's fundraising round, received a Civic Responsibility award at the event.

Created in 1999, BAAF has extensive staffing and lots of success stories. Its website boasts that "BAAF is strengthening the school's long-term financial sustainability through a comprehensive Building Our Future campaign to build its endowment and reserves. Funding supports what makes BAA unique, including expanded programming."

Like the exam schools, the Arts Academy is a selective and highly desirable option for high school in the public system. When it opened in 1998 as a pilot with more autonomy than traditional facilities, the plan for private fundraising to supplement the standard BPS foundation budget was inherent in the concept. In her book The Hardest Questions Aren't on the Test, founding head-of-school Linda Nathan described the school's mission as being a laboratory and a beacon for artistic and academic innovation.

Former BPS Superintendent Lois Harrison-Jones said in a 1994 interview that if pilot schools were successful, their programs would be duplicated in regular public schools and translate into systemwide improvements. Nathan advocated for robust arts education for all schools—a goal perhaps not attainable without private funding and extended school time?

At Boston Latin, the BLS Association funds positions with naming rights for donors—for example: the Leven Director of Athletics and the Viterbi Director of Technology. Like the BAAF, it maintains downtown offices outside of the school building, yet the BLS website links to the group.

Marshall, the BPS parent and QUEST activist, says BPS should be tracking all information about private funding if the district is serious about providing equity across the system. His group collated the data from the 2018 audit and, he says, is constantly asked for solutions. But that's not the group's mandate. He wants the wider community to brainstorm and BPS administration to take on these challenges: Why do some schools have so much more than others? Is this fair? Is this the problem or simply a symptom of inequities across the system? School districts in other cities are dealing with the same inequities, he says; QUEST plans to share examples at the June 2 meeting.

Alison Pultinas lives in Mission Hill.

The Arts Academy, under construction on Ipswich Street, with the MGM Music Hall in the foreground students raise much less money than those with students from wealthier families.

Travis Marshall, a BPS parent and QUEST activist, spoke at an April 28 Boston School Committee hearing. He believes in public funding for public schools and said that unchecked private fundraising creates and exacerbates inequities across the system.

Last year at budget time, School Committee member Jeri Robinson asked how private fundraising was factored into individual schools' budgets. The superintendent's office said that BPS does not collect and report on data for fundraising for individual schools.

QUEST will hold a virtual public

NOT QUITE TO-YOUR-DOOR SERVICE—BUT CLOSE!

The concentration of BU dorms—once private apartment buildings—in Audubon Circle at Buswell Street prompted one enterprising UPS Store to secure City permits so it could park a tractor trailer on Park Drive for 10 days and open a pop-up store selling packing boxes and accepting shipping orders from students leaving for the summer.

Only Pharmaceutical Companies Can Keep Drug Costs Down

BY IVY SALTSMAN

A parent's role, above all else, is to protect their family. No matter the risk, no matter the gravity, a mother or father must be prepared to step in whenever their child is in danger without hesitation. Anna Horiatis knows this firsthand.

In 2003, Anna and her husband Steve had three young children: five-year-old Eleftheria (Terri for short) and three-year-old identical twins named George and Evan. The boys were the same in every sense of the word—their looks and mannerisms matched each other almost exactly. Yet, there was more to these similarities than Anna knew during the boys' first few years of life; and all it took to realize this was a trip to the grocery store.

It was a seemingly ordinary shopping trip for Anna. Young Evan sat in the child's seat of the shopping cart as Anna slowly pushed her cart along the grocery aisle, browsing through the shelves of food. Anna took a brief moment to look down at her son and noticed immediately that something was wrong: Evan's eyes were swelling. Nothing specific seemed to be causing the reaction, but it was clear that there was a problem. It was at this point that one grocery shopping trip became anything but ordinary. Anna dropped everything and rushed Evan to a nearby doctor. Evan's face continued to swell until the doctor gave him Benadryl, relieving the reaction. Luckily, Evan did not need an EpiPen that day. But he came close.

After the incident, Anna decided to have both of her sons tested for peanut allergies. George had once gotten sick from eating a peanut butter cookie given to him by his sister ("Come on, George! Try it!"), so she felt it was safest to check both of the twins. Each of their tests came back positive.

Both Evan and George now require EpiPens in case of an emergency. The medication comes at a great cost: Anna and Steve pay $150 in copayment for their four EpiPens. Their insurance company pays for about $525 of the original price. The Horiatis family is in a stable enough position financially to have health insurance; yet, not every family in the United States has this type of security. Not only can some families not afford the insurance at all, but not every plan pays for specific medications. For some, this means making a choice between which is more necessary: their child's allergy lifeline or their monthly electric bill.

Prescription drug prices in the United States have seen a rapid increase within the past few years. These drugs include epinephrine and insulin—two of the most commonly recognized and used medications in the country. Epinephrine is the drug needed to relieve allergic reactions and protect people from going into anaphylactic shock, while insulin is an essential hormone for those with diabetes.

Drug companies have been increasing prices not only on new drugs, but on older generic ones as well. A study by the University of Pittsburgh and the UPMC Center for High-Value Health Care found that each year "the price of brand-name oral medications increased by about 9 percent—nearly five times the rate of general inflation over the same time period—and the price of brand-name injectables increased by 15 percent." In both of these cases, the prices were "overwhelmingly attributable" to existing drugs.

The EpiPen typically comes in a pack of two injectors; a 2018 article from the American Council on Science and Health reported that the price rose from about $94 to more than $600 in just nine years.

Insulin prices have seen an equally striking rise. A study conducted by the Health Care Cost Institute observed the spending on individuals with Type 1 diabetes—a condition that is dependent on insulin, as the pancreas (an organ in the abdomen that creates enzymes crucial to digestion and makes and releases hormones into the bloodstream) produces little to no insulin on its own. In 2012, annual spending for insulin per person with Type 1 diabetes—which combined prices for insulin, non-insulin Rx and professional, outpatient and inpatient services—was $12,467; four years later, the total price was $18,494. The spending for insulin alone increased from $2,684 in 2012 to $5,705 in 2016. Overall, these values amounted to 23 percent and 31 percent of the total annual spending, respectively.

"I think about it all the time," Anna said of the cost of the boys' medication. "But there's nothing I can do about it. We have to get it. Regardless of what we have to do, we have to buy it." Some cannot even get past the second sentence of Anna's words. There are many individuals who have to search for places—which sometimes requires traveling farther away from where they live—where they can buy insulin out-of-pocket. Walmart, for example, sells insulin that patients can pick up themselves for about $30. Nevertheless, these insulins are not the same as those from prescriptions and may not have the sugars necessary to fulfill what the patients' bodies need to survive.

During the pandemic, flyers around Boston advertising "We Buy Insulin" were a common sight. These ads may indicate that Boston residents were willing to give up life-saving medicine to pay their bills. And where do these companies (or individuals) purchasing the insulin resell it? Is this a scheme to combat the rising prescription costs?

Past studies support the idea that diabetic individuals and others with chronic conditions might be skipping doses of medication: A 2015 report from the National Center for Health Statistics found that among Americans under the age of 65, six percent of those who had private insurance purposely missed receiving their medications to save money; 10 percent for those with Medicaid and 14 percent of those with no insurance did the same. With many households facing financial hardship during the pandemic, this practice may be more common than ever.

However, pharmaceutical companies have the power to combat this problem. "There definitely is a solution," Shila O'Reilly BSN, RN, CDE, a diabetes nurse educator and DSME program coordinator at the Lahey Hospital Endocrine Clinic, said about rising insulin costs. "I'm sure it's pretty complicated, but I know that it does not cost much at all to make these insulins. In order for companies to make a profit, they can still lower these prices a huge amount and people would still be able to take the insulin that they need."

Fenway News Annual Meeting Returns, Remotely, on July 8

The Fenway News Association will hold its 2021 annual meeting on Thursday, July 8, over Zoom. The meeting will begin at 6:30pm, but we'll keep things short and wrap up by 7:30pm.

We suspended our 2020 meeting amid the initial uncertainties of the pandemic. This year, given the long lead time that planning the meeting requires, we opted to stay remote. Next year we expect to return to a fully in-person meeting with a speaker (and food!).

Membership in the Fenway News Association is open to anyone in the Fenway, Mission Hill, and other communities we serve. Our bylaws require you to join at least 14 days before the annual meeting if you wish to cast a vote. A list of current members appears at right. Please email fenwaynews@gmail.com by June 24 if you wish to join or have us take you off our rolls. And we look forward to seeing you on the 8th!

DEADLINE NEARS FOR BEAUTIFICATION FUNDS

Although it won't cover planting wisteria in your Victory Garden plot (where we spotted this beauty last month), The Boston Planning & Development Agency has up to $100,000 to fund temporary or permanent beautification projects in the Fenway. The funds come from Red Sox payments for the use of public air rights above Lansdowne Street. Applicants for Fenway Park Demonstration Project funds must submit a plan to the BPDA that describes how the proposed project would use the funding to produce the greatest measurable impact in the community. Projects must be fully accessible to the public. Download an application here and submit it by Wednesday, June 9, at 5pm.

Reduced 55 Bus Service Returns June 20

The fight to save the 55 bus was successful, and the MBTA now promises that it will restore service on June 20. The bus will run at a reduced frequency, from 10am to 3:30pm every day and continue a shortened route that terminates at Copley instead of Park Street. Final schedules will be available online in early June. No word yet on what a fall schedule might look like. In other bus-service news, the MBTA's Better Bus project will hold a public meeting to describe its planning for reinventing bus routes to improve service for riders. Visit www.mbta.com/events/2021-06-08/bus-network-redesign-public-meeting for more information.

DESIGN WEEK WALKING TOUR FOCUSES ON CHRISTIAN SCIENCE PLAZA REVAMP

In a Design Week walking tour sponsored by the Boston Preservation Alliance on May 1, landscape architect John Amodeo of IBI Placemaking explained IBI's design for renovating the Christian Science Plaza. IBI shortened the Reflecting Pool, made it considerably shallower (to reduce water use), and resurfaced the pool's basin with granite pavers. The plan focused on enhancing pedestrian access from Mass. Ave. to Dalton Street and better defining plaza edges at the Children's Fountain corner with new seating, landscaping, lighting and signs.

Artists' Plantings Reframe, Foreground Experiences of Communities of Color

Two new outdoor installations, opening June 22, continue the Museum of Fine Arts' deep dive into broader context for and new analysis of Cyrus Dallin's sculpture "Appeal to the Great Spirit." Museum Director Matthew Teitelbaum began this process publicly two years ago on Indigenous Peoples' Day.

Artist Elizabeth James-Perry—identified in a media release as an enrolled citizen of the Wampanoag Tribe of Gay Head-Aquinnah—envisioned planting mounds of corn and beans surrounding the statue. By late September, the corn should have grown close to 12 feet high, creating a screen around the pedestal and the stallion that Perry describes as a reclamation of Boston as Indigenous land.

A second garden on the east lawn near the Huntington Ave. entrance will expand Ekuia Holmes's 2018 "Sunflowers for Roxbury" project. "Radiant Community" will feature between 2,000 and 3,000 sunflowers of four different species. It's part of the Roxbury Sunflower Project, which each year distributes thousands of sunflower seeds across the neighborhood to symbolize the community's strength and beauty. The project's Tumblr site, roxburysunflowerproject.tumblr.com, has images and explains that "Sunflowers represent, among other things, resilience, self-determination, and the ability for a community to evolve and emerge while staying grounded in its history and traditions."

The Museum has scheduled a virtual event focusing on the installations on June 22 at 5pm, "Planting Together: Conversation with Ekuia Holmes and Elizabeth James-Perry." Visit www.mfa.org/event/planting-together-conversation-with-ekua-holmes-and-elizabeth-james-perry for details.

From Cars to Labs, 109 Brookline Ave. Tracks Economic Evolution

BY ALISON PULTINAS

Eddie Carmody, project manager for the Boston Planning & Development Agency, is in charge of the public review process for the proposed lab project at 109 Brookline Ave. and 20 Overland Street. Carmody met in May with the Citizens Advisory Committee and the general public, and comments on the project notification form are due June 1, although that deadline might be extended.

The current proposal will cater to one of the hottest sectors of the Boston economy today, life sciences research. The existing brick-and-concrete buildings, which date to 1915-1916, also served one of the hottest sectors of its day: automobiles. Although the buildings have undergone multiple renovations for a variety of uses—office space, storage, art school, warehouse, research lab, telecommunications infrastructure, restaurant (remember Aku, Aku?) and, for a period in the 1920s to 1930s, US Post Office facility with an entry on Burlington Avenue—they began life as facilities for Midwestern manufacturer Willys-Overland Motors, housing a showroom and repair garage for Overland cars. Overland Street's name suggests the significance of the original facility.

The proposal for a 10-story lab would demolish 109 Brookline, renovate 20 Overland, and build above the Burlington alley.

IN CASE YOU MISSED IT

A LOT HAPPENED IN OUR NEIGHBORHOODS SINCE THE LAST ISSUE, INCLUDING...

In its annual “Best Places to Live” issue, the Globe’s Sunday magazine crowned Mission Hill the best “mid-price neighborhood” in Boston. The article confirmed something residents have said for years: MH ain’t the bargain it used to be. Home prices have spiked by 48.5 percent in just five years. The new Mass Pike on-ramp from Newbury Street opened, an early phase in development of the Pike’s Parcel 12 air rights site. The new ramp eliminates a death-defying configuration that forced merging drivers to join speed-crazed Pike traffic just seconds after leaving a city street. Parcel 12 project will absorb the land under the old ramp.

Following the lead of local colleges in May, 16 BPS high schools will hold graduation ceremonies at Fenway Park June 7 to 21. Area schools using the ballpark will include Boston Arts Academy, Boston Latin School, Dearborn STEM Academy, Fenway High School, and John D. O’Bryant School of Math and Science. The Boston Public Library announced that it will begin a limited reopening of multiple branches, including Copley Square, in June. Northeastern and the Nahant Board of Selectmen got into a PR pissing match in advance of the May 15 town meeting. Board members put an item on the meeting warrant to authorize taking a Northeastern parcel on East Point by eminent domain. According to The Lynn Item, NU received the land from the federal government in 1966 but only announced plans to develop it in 2018, stirring widespread resident opposition. The Town values the parcels at $2 million, but the university called that a lowball figure and warned that if the case gets dragged into court, a loss would put the Town on the hook for an additional $250,000 per month to cover the cost of construction delays. The Town wants to turn the site into a wildlife sanctuary. Related Beal landed a flashy anchor tenant for One Kenmore, under construction in the eponymous square: wearable-tech startup Whoop (basically FitBit, but fancier). The company currently works out of offices on Boylston Street in the West Fens, but its 121,000SF lease will quadruple its work space. Whoop also plans to double its workforce to 1,000 by the time it moves in, according to the Globe. In an article in Commonwealth magazine, developer Jon Rosenthal says the BOWER apartments (in the recently completed first phase of the Fenway Center next to Yawkey Station) have become the first multifamily building in Boston to win LEED Gold certification. A building can qualify for a LEED rating without getting certified to confirm claimed sustainability features. Amazon announced $1 million in donations to help Boston arts organizations recover from the pandemic, including a $150,000 “anchor donation” to Boston Arts Academy. Barely a week after announcing one of its largest-ever donations—$50 million from the family of a former patient to fund research on pancreatic cancer—Dana Farber Cancer Institute launched an ambitious $2 billion fund-raising campaign. Or, ICYMI should say, launched it publicly, since the “quiet” stage of the campaign began in 2017, according to a Globe story. The City’s Air Pollution Control Commission lifted a restriction on the garage at the Hilton Boston Back Bay that limited parking only to hotel guests. APCC staff confirmed that the permit still forbids general commercial parking in the 256-stall garage.

The Arts

The Era When Women Stormed Into Photography

BY RUTH KHOWAIS

The Museum of Fine Arts has been featuring women artists in an exhibit entitled “Women Take the Floor” since 2019. The exhibit includes seven thematic galleries. The most recent addition to this exhibit is a roomful of 30 photographs by women made during a pivotal period when large numbers of women began pursuing photography as an artistic medium and a profession.

“Women Photographers 1965-1985” addresses themes of identity, landscape, domestic life, street scenes, and political action. Many of the photos are portraits.

In 1965, the women’s movement was in full swing: Betty Friedan’s book The Feminine Mystique had just become a bestseller, and the Equal Pay and Civil Rights Acts had been newly written into law. The women’s movement inspired the photographers in this exhibit. Many were essentially self-taught, driven by a desire to express themselves.

When Rolling Stone hired Annie Leibovitz in 1970, few female photographers worked for magazines. By 1973, she had become Rolling Stone’s chief photographer. Featured in this exhibit is her dynamic portrait of Patti Smith in a New Orleans warehouse surrounded by flaming barrels of kerosene.

There is also Diane Arbus’s dramatic 1968 black-and-white photograph of wealthy Boston socialite Brenda Diana Duff Frazier, debutante of the year in 1938. In the photo, Francis dresses in an elegant manner to recreate her past glory.

Ming Smith was the only female member of the all-black Kamoinge Workshop in New York during the 1960s and 1970s. In her photos, such as “Amen Corner Sisters,” she recorded the vibrant street life of Harlem.

One of the most interesting photos, because it looks like a painting, is “Gray Horse and Car Radio Antenna” by Barbara Norfleet, an unsettling collision of nature and technology. Norfleet, who has taught at Harvard and curated a photographic archive at the Fogg Art Museum, created a series of photos with animals in human settings to symbolize the effects of population growth and climate change.

The exhibit also highlights recently acquired works by lesser-known photographers working in Argentina, Mexico, Chile, and Canada. These artists include Argentina’s Adriana Lestido. After her husband went missing under the brutal dictatorship of Jorge Rafael Videla, Lestido started documenting the women who demonstrated every week outside the country’s presidential palace. Her black-and-white photo “Mother and Daughter from Mothers of Plaza del Mayo” offers a striking example.

Paz Errazuriz, who is Chilean, actively pursued photography under the repressive dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, a time when it was dangerous for a woman to walk down the street carrying a camera. Equally dangerous was her choice to document some of the country’s most vulnerable and marginalized people. The photo “Mercedes and Evelyn,” from 1983, comes from a series Errazuriz produced about sex workers living in a red light district.

American-Canadian photographer Lynne Cohen is known for her photographs of empty interiors, including living rooms, public halls, laboratories, offices, and showrooms. Her photos as seen in this show are usually devoid of human presence.

“Women Photographers 1965-1985” runs through November 28. Head to the Art of the Americas Wing, level 3. To get to Gallery 335, walk through one of the main rooms of Women Take the Floor, which features some amazing paintings.

Ruth Khowais lives in the West Fens.

GARDNER THEFT: NO STONE UNTURNED, FEW QUESTIONS ANSWERED

BY STEVE WOLF

If you’ve lost track of the twisty tale of the 1990 Gardner Museum break-in, don’t worry: so has everyone who’s investigated it. More accurately, everyone has a theory but can’t prove it’s the right one. So (semi-spoiler alert) don’t go into the very polished Netflix documentary, This Is A Robbery: The World’s Greatest Art Heist, expecting to come out knowing whodunnit.

That aside, there’s lots to admire. From the start you feel you’re in capable hands. Filmmaker Colin Barnicle and his team vividly employ animation, re-enactments, grainy TV news clips, eyewitness interviews, moody music, and other tools to recreate the theft. Episode 1 (of four) focuses on the museum’s history and the heist itself. It also explores each piece’s significance, from minor Degas sketches to the marquee canvases Christ in The Storm on the Sea of Galilee (Rembrandt’s only seascape) and The Concert (one of just 35 Vermeers in existence).

The series flags a bit when it turns to whodunnit (and how) in the following episodes. Initial ideas—the IRA? Italian Mafia? Pot-smoking security guard? Notorious art thief?—quickly crash and burn. Episode 4 gives us the FBI’s theory, by far the most fleshed-out. Valiant work with animated maps, diagrams, and straight-talking journalists (including the Globe’s Shelley Murphy and Steve Kurkjian, who covered the story) keeps the narrative moving, but it’s still a hot mess of wise guys whose grubby doings open a window onto a grittier, ungentrified Boston now fading away. The thick accents and endless mugshots make you wonder if you tuned into a Ben Affleck crime caper by mistake.

Even without closure, the story remains fascinating—maybe even because we have no answers (although the FBI now claims it knows who did it). If you get lost along the way, just enjoy the ride, admire the craft, and learn a thing or two you didn’t know before. The series leaves you thinking we may still learn the full story when someone, some day, points the way to the Gardner’s lost treasures. Steve Wolf lives in the West Fens.

EATS BEAT

On May 20, the Boston Globe reported that New York-based Blue Ribbon Restaurant Group will take over the leases for Eastern Standard, Island Creek Oyster Bar, and the Hawthorne in Kenmore Square. The group operates restaurants in New York, Las Vegas, Miami, and Los Angeles. Two concepts for their Boston operations will be similar to those they’ll replace: the Eastern Standard space will remain a brasserie, and the Island Creek space will maintain a seafood focus. The Hawthorne will become a sushi restaurant. The announcement rings down the curtain on a contentious and unusually public struggle between Garrett Harker, who led the group that built the three earlier (and much-loved) restaurants, and his landlord, Urban Meritage.

Time Out Market reopened on May 13. Returning restaurants include Michael Schlow’s Italian Kitchen, Cusser’s Roast Beef & Seafood, Bisq, Taqueria el Barrio, Anoush’ella, and Union Square Donuts (because, you know, maple-bacon donuts).

Let’s Call These Artists Paint Box Heroes

BY ALISON PULTINAS

MassArt senior Mellina Illinger’s plein-air work on six utility boxes in Mission Hill began on May 13. Her illustrative images with colorful backgrounds adorn boxes at Hanlon Square/Brigham Circle, with others located further down Tremont Street toward Roxbury Crossing. She won the commissions through the City’s Paint Box program.

Illinger’s process begins with a coat of Kilz primer, on which she sketches an outline of the design. She finishes the design with fast-drying exterior acrylic paints. She hoped to complete the six designs in a few short days with support from Elizabeth DiCicco, director of Campus and External Exhibitions at MassArt. Paint Box guidelines allow artists to include their signature on the boxes—helpful for new graduates with dreams of future commissions.

The annual Paint Box program is sponsored by the City’s Arts and Culture department. Mission Hill Main Streets and MassArt worked together to choose the particular locations and the artist.

It’s not too late to apply for this year’s funding round; deadline for proposals is May 31. Artists receive a $500 stipend per box, with $200 on approval (for the cost of supplies) and $300 paid upon completion of the work. Visit <https://cityofbostonartsandculture.submittable.com/submit/193405/paintbox-2021> for details.

Last year’s selections included four boxes in the Fenway. One of those has been completed, at Evans Way and Huntington Avenue. Locations at Boylston Street and Mass. Ave. and St. Botolph Street and Mass. Ave are still waiting for their artists. Kristin McGeehan of the Arts and Culture department said the department plans to update a new online map of the box murals in early June, with the finalized locations for this year’s projects as well as those awarded in 2020.
