Area Must Up for Changing Climate

BY SHRADHA KAKADE

In the fall of 1996, when a three-day storm hit Boston, the Muddy River overtopped its bank and inundated Green Line subway tunnels between Kenmore and Arlington and nearby homes, hospitals, businesses, and schools. The Museum of Fine Arts was among the institutions that suffered damage. At the time, the MFA was not aware of the risk of flooding.

Siegel shared that the MFA was satisfied with the outcome of Phase 1 of the project, and voiced support for Phase 2, which was unveiled last month. While water and related damage due to heavy rainfall, sea-level rise, and drainage issues are a concern, the MFA is confident that the project will protect the museum and its collections.
